Then there are some death threats saying that dancing in red shoes will kill you (hence the title), there's some drama about her bust size, her artist of a sister is outraged about censorship, and there's a new boy at school whom, of course, Kayla is falling for.

With carefully drawn Donna Decker's DANCING IN RED SHOES WILL KILL YOU is a moving tribute to the fourteen female engineering students who were shot and killed in the 1989 Montreal Massacre. Decker's account is written as fiction, but it is meticulously researched and full of detail.

Dancing in Red Shoes Will Kill You is an important novel by first time author, Dorian Cirrone. Ms. Cirrone tackles the politics of female body image through the story of Kayla, a ballet dancer with size double D breasts who is heckled by classmates and encouraged to pursue plastic surgery by her dance instructor if she wants to get leading roles as a ballerina.

About the Author. Dorian Cirrone is the author of dancing in red shoes will kill you. She lives in south Florida with her husband and her two children.

Dancing in Red Shoes Will Kill You is the marriage of emotion and action. Decker's novel underscores the myriad ways in which women's lives are shaped — and too often destroyed — by the inequality that often leads to violence.

Based off of the novel by Dorian Cirrone

Excerpt from Dancing in Red Shoes Will Kill You It isn't every day you walk into your sister's bedroom and find a naked guy on her bed, especially when that guy is your best friend, Joey. Now that I've gotten your attention – it's not what you're thinking.

When mysterious red pointed shoes appear with the message “dancing in red shoes will kill you,” more connections are made to the 1948 film, The Red Shoes, based on another fairy tale, and the feminist poem, “The Red Shirt,” by Margaret Atwood. These incidents inspire Paterson's senior project: a painting featuring female figures with various amputations—toes, tongue, foot—the centerpiece being a young man with a circumcised penis.
