End Credits starts as a quirky everyday story about two friends who are scared to admit their feelings for each other, but then comes a dark and scary twist that is reminiscent of Asian horror films. This book is well written and the twists keep you guessing until the end.

If you want to know just why I'm so excited, check out this month's single – End Credits by Simon Paul Wilson, who was until, well, a couple of days ago, the best unpublished writer on the planet (his manuscript, the Murakami-esque magical realist Yuko Zen is Elsewhere was one of the most talked about and exciting books in the history of Harper Collins' website Authonomy).

It's $2.99 or equivalent, and it's worth every penny) But this isn't a sales pitch. I wanted to talk about why I wrote this book, in particular the question of identity, of whether life is constructed between binary choices, between either-ors, or is, instead, a messy, loosely structured woollen vest of a thing.

"Love in This Club" is a song by American R&B singer Usher. Featuring rapper Jeezy, it was released on February 22, 2008 as the lead single from Usher's fifth studio album, Here I Stand. The song was written by Usher, Polow da Don, Jeezy, Darnell Dalton, Ryon Lovett, Lamar Taylor and Keith Thomas, and produced by da Don with a Las Vegas-inspired synth-driven beat.

To my surprise and delight, I learned this week that the story will be published in January as the first release in the 2015 Pankhearst Singles Club. So now I know -- when I say such-and-such would be a great name for a band, maybe I should write a story about them.

Pankhearst is an ex-parrot. Furious is the new black. You can read a brief announcement about the demise of Pankhearst on the Furious site and view the entire Pankhearst archive. So long and thanks for all the fucks you gave. Evangeline xx
