I've been a sign language interpreter for over 15 years. My answer is based on my experience and observation in that field. First and foremost an interpreter must be fluent in the source/target language pair(s) with which they work. Fluency alo...

Interpreting is done in one of two basic modes: simultaneous, which is immediate interpreting as someone is speaking, or consecutive, which is done at intervals after someone has finished saying several words or sentences. Many Spanish interpreters work in specialized roles, such as in healthcare or legal settings.
