If you're serious about freelancing, then start separating your income and savings. For every dollar I make that's business related, I split it up like this: 12% to Business (for business-related expenses) 16% to Business Taxes (this will save my butt when it comes tax time) 12% to Personal Savings

The same study also reported that one in three Americans now freelance as a career while 60% of them say that they now earn more as a freelancer than they did through traditional employment. With all of these apparent upsides to freelancing work, it's no wonder we have seen such a rapid increase in interest in the freelancing world.

The barriers are falling and the technologies available are greasing the skids for many a freelancing business entrepreneur. The key is recognizing that you don't have to head into this form of entrepreneurship willy-nilly.
